What impact does the alleged violation(s) have on the public?
I am writing to report a pattern of non-compliant campaign fundraising activities by the Pattie Gray campaign during the 2026 election cycle. The candidate has actively operated public, cash-based paid raffles to benefit her election bid. Washington State law permits campaigns to hold free door-prize drawings, but explicitly prohibits political committees from raising funds via paid gambling mechanics like raffles. Because the campaign is selling tickets to the general public, it is circumventing mandatory campaign contribution disclosure requirements. Specifically, the campaign engaged in the following documented instances: Pacific County Fair (August 2026): The candidate operated a commercial campaign booth, publishing videos on social media explicitly instructing fairgoers to "come buy a raffle ticket and support my campaign." Rod Run at the End of the World Festival (September 2026): The candidate posted a video to social media from her campaign tent openly soliciting attendees to purchase raffle tickets at $20 each or six for $100. High-value prizes—including a two-night cabin stay in Ocean Park, rounds of golf, and themed gift baskets—were used as an incentive to secure rapid cash transactions. By selling tickets to transient festival crowds, the campaign is actively accumulating campaign cash without capturing or reporting the required contributor names, addresses, and individual contribution limits as mandated by RCW 42.17A. Furthermore, if these high-value raffle prizes were donated by third parties, they must be tracked and disclosed as in-kind contributions, which do not appear to be accurately processed under standard raffle restrictions.
